
Rabbit Cages

Contributed by Admin
Thursday, 15 February 2007

Rabbit Cages

Rabbits make wonderful pets for those who prefer not to have a dog or cat. They can be kept either inside or outside in a rabbit cage. There are many things you should consider when deciding on the right rabbit cage to purchase. Rabbits are low maintenance but they do require good care.

Rabbit Cages

Rabbits make wonderful pets for those who prefer not to have a dog or cat. They can be kept either inside or outside in a rabbit cage. There are many things you should consider when deciding on the right rabbit cage to purchase. Rabbits are low maintenance but they do require good care.

You will want to consider the climate in your area before purchasing a rabbit cage. You will need something that is going to protect them from the cold if the rabbit will be staying outside. You can choose to have two rabbit cages, one for nice weather and one for cold and rainy days. Rabbits can get cold in the winter months even with their thick fur. If it is too cold, they may freeze to death.

You need to make sure your rabbit cage is going to be big large enough for the rabbit to be comfortable as they move around. They also enjoy fresh air. Metal rabbit cages are great for air circulation but not the best for when it gets cold out. A wooden rabbit cage with proper ventilation might be the perfect solution for you.

You have more room to play around with the rabbit cage type if the rabbit will be kept inside. They need lots of exercise so get a cage that they have room to romp in. It is important to keep the rabbit cage clean. You will want to offer a continuous water supply and plenty of interaction time too.

It is important to teach children to properly care for their rabbit. They need to show it respect. Never allow a child to shake a rabbit cage or the rabbit can be harmed. A rabbit is not a toy.